Views on the future operation of the Register

Annual Report of the Federal Republic of Germany on Defence Planning for 1994. Additional Comments: According to the definitions of the resolution only complete weapons or entire building kits were included; imports of deliveries of components to be used in arms production including joint production are not included. As temporary imports/exports for repair, exhibition, trial or presentation purposes also do not fall within the scope of the register, they were not included. Data include transfers by the Federal Armed Forces as well as by German industry. In Germany, arms production is part of the private sector. There are no public enterprises active in this field. Data provided are based on mandatory and checked information furnished by private enterprises. Background information on German export controls on armaments has been submitted to the United Nations on 14 July 1992 and circulated in GA Doc A/47/370 of 20 August 1992. Background information on national defence planning is attached. Updated background information as to defence and arms control policies will be submitted after publication of the respective annual reports. It becomes obvious from the figures that transfers mainly took place within NATO. Deliveries to other countries were rather rare. This reflects the German arms export policy. Temporary increases in exports are due to transfer of equipment of the former German Democratic Republic (GDR) armed forces mainly to other states parties to the Treaty of 19 November 1990 on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe and do not indicate any change in the restrictive export policies pursued by the Federal Government.

Note: Information about small arms and light weapons was not requested before 2006
